

ABSTRACT

Method and device for determining capture status of a heart chamber that receives a pulse from an implantable pulse generator (IPG). Signal processing can be used to improve the reliability of capture detection by transforming the sensed response signal into a set of morphological characteristics. Analysis of selected morphological characteristics serves to distinguish signals indicative of capture from signals indicative of loss of capture.